Redlands, CA-(September 1, 2009)

On August 28, 2009, the law firm of McCuneWright, LLP filed a class action lawsuit against Toyota Motor Corporation based on the allegations of former Toyota attorney, Dimitrius Biller, who alleges that Toyota thwarted his efforts to preserve and produce evidence in hundreds of rollover cases against Toyota.

Almost overnight, this lawsuit became a national news story. Richard D. McCune, McCuneWright partner and lead attorney in this class action against Toyota, was quoted by CBS News saying that there was key information, “that a company like Toyota should have had and which they claimed they did not have, such as fundamental test reports. If Biller is correct, significant evidence was withheld and everyone else who had cases in the same time period, was in the same boat that we are.”

This class action suit seeks to represent all plaintiffs who lost or settled cases in which Toyota allegedly concealed evidence. The complaint was filed with McCuneWright clients Bella Basco and Crystal Ennis as class representatives. Both Basco and Ennis suffered catastrophic injuries in separate rollover accidents when their respective Toyota vehicle roofs collapsed.

The class action names Toyota Motor Corporation of Japan, Toyota Motor Sales and five current or former executives and lawyers with Toyota Motor Sales. It seeks certification of two separate classes, one for Californians and the other for plaintiffs from other states that lost or settled cases with Toyota.
